handed inquiries by the Commons Commission. The commission has also started an investigation into the collapse of Fair Trading. It is understood to be examining whether the regulator should have been more involved in the operations of Futures. The collapses of Futures and Stock Exchange left customers out of pocket by hundreds of millions of pounds. The moves come after the head of the Financial Services Authority, Lord Turner, told the Commons that reforms were being carried out to prevent another collapse in the future. And Mr Giddens' departure as chairman of the Pensions Commission comes after its chairman, David Woods, was given a formal warning by the Commons for making misleading statements about the pensions industry. Mr Giddens was asked by a Conservative member how much the Futures Commission had cost taxpayers. "Substantial," he replied, without offering any further information. No more The Commons Commission is also looking at other issues in the pension industry, including whether professional services should be required to act for people in their retirement. A Commons source said: "We can't just allow these things to happen without a proper inquiry."
The Financial Services Authority has set up a panel of three former Court of Appeal judges to examine whether its failure to spot the problems that resulted in the collapse of the Futures Commission was a failure in its duty of care. The Commons Commission is also examining the collapse of the Stock Exchange and the failure of the Financial Services Authority to be more involved in its operations. Sir John Gieve, the Financial Services Authority chairman, recently told the Commons that he would not return as the FSA's chairman. The failure of the Stock Exchange to act on the lack of funds for hedging by some traders resulted in severe losses for some members of the public and their pension providers. The Pensions Commission is examining whether there was a lack of protection for members of the pension industry who entered the market at the same time as traders using Futures Commission shares.1. Technical Field The present invention relates to an
