I'm a Cyborg, Says Supreme Court Judge According to the Supreme Court of the United States, I have the right to dictate what a court is going to do in regards to the security features on a firearm, including software. If you are interested, you can read the opinion here. Amongst the comments in that piece were the following: "The court is quick to criticize about the lack of security, yet fails to acknowledge that due to time, government resources, and the money expended on security features, there are no significant threats to the public that we know of at this time." "...anyone can become a member of NRA or something like that, and run a website that makes nasty comments about Judge Dredd and the Court. It's just not necessary to maintain a membership with such a group to engage in the sort of activity that we were discussing." "What do you mean you need a SWAT team to kill a man with a gun?" I think the main issue here is that the Supreme Court is attempting to set policy about a specific law. The court is trying to decide whether or not the law is constitutional. While the opinion does hold that there are no significant threats to the public that we know of at this time, I think it does seem that the court is attempting to set policy. What if there are? What if there are unknown threats, such as a hostile foreign power, or a domestic organization, or a disgruntled employee? Should the government be allowed to set policy about how much defense against them is deemed necessary? If the Constitution does not protect gun ownership, does that mean that the government can, at any time, step in and tell anyone who owns a firearm what they can and cannot do? Right now, they can't. That's a real problem. We have a huge amount of training and laws in place to keep guns out of the wrong hands, but unfortunately that's not always the case. That's why this proposed policy is troubling, because if it stands, they can do it. If it were to stand, it would
